Most of these cases have been continued. In the meantime the Protective Association is gathering more evidence. The story is the old one. Poverty that prevented a "good time" back home; the glare of the city and wicked men.

But the girl is contrite now. She wants to go to her mother in Riddott.

The Juvenile Protective Association broke a serious angle today when they accused Judge Mahoney of being unfair in the girl's case against Dave Lewinsohn, owner of the Congress Cafe. The report of the association on that case is as follows:

"The case of Congress Cafe, 506 Wabash av., selling liquor to minors, which began Oct. 21 before a jury in Judge Mahoney's court, was continued. Judge Mahoney was not only unfair, but discourteous to the plaintiff's side.

"Amanda told a straightforward story about drinking in this cafe—the kind of drinks—who paid for them—and that she personally gave the order. Joseph Irose, who paid for the drinks, told that he took Amanda there upon at least two occasions and named the drinks bought.

"Amanda's aunt testified as to her age. She said she had visited Amanda's home in November, 1898. Her mother was pregnant at that time. In May, 1899, she received a letter from Amanda's father, stating they had a baby girl and they would name it "Amanda" for her. The following February she visited Amanda's home and saw this little baby girl who was named for her and who then was about 9 months old. Judge Mahoney tried to discredit the strength of this statement. Remarked that the baby might be 2 years old, and not 9 months. Ass't State's Att'y Hogan, after much trouble convinced Judge Mahoney by reading the statute that such testimony should be accepted.

"Mr. Gross of the Citizens' League, who signed the complaint, was not permitted to testify by Judge Mahoney because he had been in courtroom during part of trial.

"The police officer who checks up the liquor licenses said he knew David Lewinsohn to be the owner of Congress Cafe, 506 Wabash av., and identified him in court as the defendant.

"Judge Mahoney surprised the jurors and Ass't State's Att'y Hogan by saying: 'I take this case from the jury. The defendant is discharged.' Mr. Hogan was not given an opportunity to say anything because Judge Mahoney left the room as soon as he had made that remark.

"All the saloonkeepers present shook hands with David Lewinsohn, the owner of the Congress Cafe. The jurors and the witnesses for plaintiff acted as if they were too surprised to move.

"Later an investigator heard that Judge Mahoney said: 'Ass't State's Att'y Hogan did not prove that the Congress Cafe was at 506 Wabash av.'

"Judge Mahoney permitted and insisted on Amanda telling about other cafes—even though Att'y Hogan did his best to object. The liquor in-
